| Argentina, 1975-1980: The Making of U.S. Human Rights Policy | The Digital National Security Archive, created in collaboration with the U.S. National Security Archive contains declassified government documents covering critical world events, countries, and U.S. policy decisions from post World War II through the 21 st century. Policy documents included: presidential directives, internal memos, diplomatic dispatches, meeting notes, independent reports, briefing papers, White House communications, email, confidential letters, and other once-classified material. Argentina, 1975-1980: The Making of U.S. Human Rights Policy chronicles the development of U.S. policy as it attempts to deal with the tragedy experienced in Argentina during the critical, formative period of the late 1970's, which featured a political collapse verging on civil war; a military coup; and massive illegal detentions, torture and kidnappings. The declassified records illustrate the birth of human rights as a priority in U.S. foreign policy – along with more traditional concerns ranging from the spread of international communism to nuclear proliferation in Latin America.
